These days, performance management is a source of dissatisfaction at many organizations. Large shares of respondents to a recent McKinsey Global Survey on the topic say their organizations' current systems and practices have no effect—or even a negative one—on company performance. 1 Moreover, they do not see positive returns on investment for the time spent on performance management.

Harnessing the power of performance management

American presidents have spent a great deal of time proclaiming US leadership of the global system. The decision to withdraw from the Paris Agreement undermines much of what they have said.
